s political interests and consistent attempts to destroy the Iranian revolution and smear its progressive and progressive Islamic movements, for which no political or ideological or ethnic distinction can be applied. The Shah's government had a close relationship with the CIA, which it used to move its agents and assets throughout the country. The network was particularly influential in the holy cities of Qom, Mashhad, and Najaf. The Shah was deeply involved in the harassment, imprisonment, and torture of Iranian socialists, communists, and other progressive elements. Thus, in a time when Iran was experiencing a mounting wave of left-wing movements and was threatened by the Soviet Union, the Shah's repressive measures effectively neutralized the left-wing currents within the country. The two conditions required for the takeover by the Shah, were the success of the American Army's offensive against the Persian tribes of the south, and the readiness of the Shah and some of his closest associates to co-operate with the imperialists. The American victory in the south and the new momentum in Iran's international stance gave the Shah the political justification, as well as the personal will, to proceed with the takeover. Struggle for democracy and freedom Immediately after the coup, in order to consolidate its rule, the Shah turned to the bureaucracy and the military to take over power. His first goal was to amend the constitution in such a way as to make it more in line with the Shah's interpretation of power. The process included land reform, the constitutional abolition of the Majlis, and the dismantling of the labor unions. It was also accompanied by a purge of the bureaucracy and the army. It was only in September of 1978 that the King removed the Shah's closest advisers. The Shah's domestic and international policies throughout this period were relentlessly hostile to the Iranians and the Iranian revolution. He effectively liquidated the opposition by imprisoning its leaders, arresting its supporters, and assassinating its militants. The Shah's foreign policy was even more severe. He imposed an embargo on oil imports from the United States. The Shah used his new status to increase his own power and to crush any opposition or criticism. His goal was to turn Iran into a West-dominated oil state. During these years, the Shah's government was also in constant contact with the American and Israeli secret services. This was the case with the Khatam-ol-Anbia Revolutionary Coordinating Committee (KHARAKCO, a political opposition group founded after
