What's new:

A blog post updating our list of space-based games. Read on if you'd like to know if you're good at killing stuff. Random thoughts: It's always a pleasure to see a post where I haven't been mentioned before. Announcer v. 1.0 has returned and I've not been mentioned before:

Announcer v. 1.0 released. Fix being worked on. @iamjungwi pic.twitter.com/EAS5zvbFZE

Random thoughts: Onward. You will continue to see more and more of these posts! Fun trivia from Announcer's Launch Day, 25 years ago: I had already played the game in 1993, and the first one I actually post about is from 1994. Almost a full decade. There is a sad lack of precisely accurate French-language statistics, e.g.: "[S]ome 65% of French gamers never finish a game once they start it. These gamers seem to be very difficult to influence in that 95% of the titles published for them never seem to change their behaviors." "The average penetration rate is rather reassuring: 65% of the populations who would be gamers have computer or Internet access, which is slightly more than the corresponding rate in Germany." The published figures for French-speaking countries don't make much sense to me because they are so spread out, but I'll probably write more on this when I can translate it. "Chinese millennials are better at coding than their predecessors, thanks to their constant need to play mobile games, which teach game programming in a fun and easy way." "Despite a big French population... French gamers have a poor average level of qualifications due to the starting age of 12 in 2010." Graph

AdvertisementOEM or Original Equipment Manufacturer, is a common method of naming the company that built a product for another company. So, when you see a "CPU Tower" you need to be careful to check if the manufacturer is the company name (HP) or the actual place and name of the company building the tower. This is a common misnomer, and the OEM is usually a place and name of a small shop in a small area who builds 'oem' computer chassis. This here is just a barrel of laughs by a US Based VAR who is looking at doing some US based business for China in the fast approaching future. You would not get this shipped to you in the US, save for a one time deal. But you could go to your local source and buy one if you wanted to. Just don't expect it to come without TIN, TCE, FFL, and the usual. Good in theory, but the system is going to get mucho troll on this one as the shipment is going to be getting stuck somewhere in a port. I say, pay for it to come direct here, and we will take care of shipping once it has cleared Customs. I say, pay for it to come direct here, and we will take care of shipping once it has cleared Customs. it would be more difficult to get here then i would think. yeah.. i would think it would be alot harder then getting to egypt, but they could probably get it here if they really wanted to... I believe it will be difficult, but it would also be possible, if you have someone in the US with the necessary paperwork. The key to this is the Customs import process:) If Customs allows it, it is legal. If Customs doesn't let it in, then it isn't. Even if you meet the requirements for a "special purpose" Customs license, there is no guarantee of it. The other issue is that to drive these CPU cases from China to the US, they have to do
