An attorney for former President George H. W. Bush tried to persuade a federal judge to reject expert testimony against him, according to the ex-President's legal team. That attorney, Alec Judah, argued Wednesday against the prosecutor's plan to call the expert, because, according to the unsealed transcript, he would not only testify that Mr. Bush had repeatedly tried to smother his son, but that he was the one responsible for the crime and had ordered it. "There's nothing more important in terms of the jury panel than the individual jurors' perception of their peers in the community," Mr. Judah, the Houston lawyer who was representing Mr. Bush in his federal drug case, said Wednesday. In a footnote within his seven-page argument, Mr. Judah wrote a letter to the judge, saying: "Any testimony concerning possible malice on the part of the deceased under your charge for the purposes of malice murder and murder in the second degree, however, would, if any, be extremely limited and highly unlikely to be received by the court unless sufficient

Mr. Bush, now 93, did not testify. He continued using the powerful drug after taking office, and his withdrawal symptoms caused him to attempt to smother his son with a pillow. Brent Johnston, who pleaded guilty to assisting in an illegal drug dealing operation, testified that Mr. Bush had a 2005 conversation in which he discussed ordering this very behavior. Like other attempts at smothering, the former president usually concealed the crime by replacing the pillow with a pillowcase. Witnesses testified to Mr. Bush’s cocaine-fueled tirades against the U.S. attorney general, Aaron B. Swartz. In the first trial, Mr. Bush was convicted of distributing cocaine and the distribution of a controlled substance near where the then 13-year-old shot himself in
