(tlgcp3@gmail.com) if you're willing to do this for me! A: First of all, you have to create a.zip archive of the files on your PC. This might sound like a lot of work, but it's quite simple. First of all, you have to save the files you want to have in your archive, one at a time. To make a file archive with Windows Explorer, right-click the file you want to save and select "Compress" from the menu. If you're using Mac OSX, open the file explorer window and select the top-right icon. Alternatively, if you use the archive software to which you downloaded the game, you can just open it in that software and drag and drop the files you want to archive. You have to find the rar.exe program and use that. For Windows, this is located in the C:\program files\7-Zip\ directory. For Mac, it is located in the /Applications directory. The archive size should be around 70 MB. Now, you have to convert this archive in a.rar one and extract it. The.rar format is very simple. After the.rar archive, you will find the following files in a.rar file: program.ini program.ini is a configuration file for the program. It has two parameters that you can change: Archive: This is the name of the.rar archive you created. Password: This is the password for the archive. If you don't know how to use 7-Zip and change the parameters for the program.ini file

In my web project, should the solution file contain the entire project - as in all.aspx,.ascx,.cs,.config files? Or should it only contain the.cs and.aspx files for the public facing content of the web project? What are the pros and cons for each approach? Also, is there any other information I should take into consideration when deciding what to include in my solution file? A: I would always include all of those files that pertain to the public facing content, as well as any of the service or class dlls. You should not include a project file containing a ASP.NET project in a web deployment project. The project file will be fine for a local development machine, but on a production site you need to be careful not to break functionality. The project file, as well as all of the other files you mentioned, must be part of the content that is to be deployed to a web site. A: I would include everything for simplicity - if you create a feature, and click on publish (not deploy), you want to be able to see that you have a feature to edit. As far as I know, both of these approaches have worked for me. A: I always include the.Web and.Web.csproj files. I like the.web.csproj file because it represents a build-in project so I do not need to create one. Cycling
