Practical management of odontogenic infections using topical antibiotics in hospitalized patients. The purpose of this study was to evaluate the efficacy of a fixed-dose combination of amoxicillin and clavulanic acid (AMC) solution for the management of odontogenic infections in hospitalized patients. This was a prospective, randomized, open, nonblinded, controlled study. Patients with odontogenic infections as defined by a clinical pathologic diagnosis with computed tomography and/or magnetic resonance imaging were enrolled. AMC solution or a standard treatment with parenteral ceftriaxone was administered daily. The time to treatment failure (measured as a composite of length of hospitalization and/or antibiotic treatment), time to resolution of clinical signs and symptoms, and time to the return of oral function were measured for each group. The treatment and control groups were well-balanced with regard to variables examined. The median time to treatment failure in the AMC group (3.2 days) was significantly less than the median time to treatment failure in the control group (6.0 days); P
