The report looks at the driving factors and the prospects for digitization in general, particularly within the EU’s 7th Framework research agenda. The results are presented in the form of a checklist, which combines recommendations for best practice to help shape the strategy of hospital and care organizations, as well as medical professionals and national policy makers, on what needs to be done. The report also presents an overview of the status of digital interoperability and data sharing in Europe, and various contributing factors, as well as the opportunities, challenges and potential improvements to the current situation. “Digital interoperability and data sharing are important levers in health-related research and innovation, and they are key to improving healthcare services to meet the increased expectations from patients,” said Helena Rodríguez del Campo, Chairperson of the Healthcare Delivery Alliance. “In our opinion, the lack of a structured and unified strategy to ensure the transformation of health service systems in the EU is a fundamental problem that remains unaddressed by the European Commission. The new Commission should be commended for addressing that challenge, and it is now time to translate this into action.” The report recommends taking the following steps: Raising public awareness of the need for digital interoperability and data sharing in Europe. Developing a strategy for the digitization of healthcare and patient records in the EU. Boosting digital interoperability and data sharing in health research and innovation in Europe. Adopting a two-pronged approach towards healthcare service transformation in Europe. Creating a digital identity roadmap for Europe. Significant technical progress in securing connectivity and patient privacy is required before digital interoperability can become a reality. “Big data is not the only solution to digitization,” said Marco Palazzo, from the European Federation of Public Service Unions. “Challenges in terms of data governance
